The Feminist Avant-Garde of the 1970s

THE HOUSEWIFE STEREOTYPE, THE CONVENTIONAL: THE HISTORY OF FEMINIST ARTISTS OF THE 1970S ADDRESSED IN A RADICAL BUSHAPING OF ART BISTORY AT THE RAMBURGER KUNSTHALLE.

"Down-with religious icorography and pomorprophic photography, the desire for movellay, the desire of possessing women, of farteelising fathout them?", Angela Holine's call to accoss in Melieur Almeide: Learning to Ser (1905) Eurosetes the necessity for change in the canonic of art history. A call to change that is the focus of the Vennese corporate art collection, Sammlung Verbund. Under the commonal directionhip of Gabriele Schot, the collection includes significant bodies of work by some of the lary femirist award-garde artists of the 1970s tas well as by many mule artists, it should be pointed that forms the basis of the cornect touring exhibition The familiary. Award-Gorde of the 7970s, currently on show at the Hamburger Kurschulle, Hamburg, and curated by Schor and Merle Baddon.

The exhibition features the work of more than 30 international women unites who collectively reshaped the way in which women and their bodies. were represented. Uniter previous female group exhibitions, such as the seminal 2007 touring exhibition, InRCVI Air and the Reminist Revelution, an international survey of the relationship between arc and feminism curated by Coonie Butler, Schor's exhibition distinctly focuses on "how-somen artists changed the image and the representation of screen in art." Schor sage that after MACK there was a proliferation of shows papping up addressing Funiries are ellemesresponpidas (2009-2011), Rubelle Art and Feminism (2009), and Schools own custool exhibition Dostor (2010), MADIC was Important and influential for bringing to the forefront known and unknown formula action from the 1970s onwords, and indeed it had a massive influence on the collecting strategy of the Samerlung Verbund. Butlat's intention with MACKI was onystal clear. "To make the case that feminism's impact on art of the 1970s constitutes the most influential international art imovement of any during the post-war period." Butter continues through, explaining that the reason, the incurrent hasn't achieved this recognised status is "because of the fact that it is seldow cohered, formally or critically, to a reovernment in the same way, as Alexant Expressionium, Historium or even Fluxus."

School, in a way, is formalising and making collector the feminist art movement through this manying of the term "awat-gards" with the movement. She demands the revision of the careon of art history for the women's awar-garde movement to be part of the collective comolous, soften than a side note. This is happening, slowly but surely, with its more in the work of these female artists. The history of women in the art world is not just conceived to female artists though – female curators for the same uphilit backs documents, which has been narring since 1955, had its first female suretor in 1997 followments XI. The Versian Service, which began in 1895, only had its first female curators have women held the curatorial reins, Maria de Contel and Rose Mantinesi in 2005 – 110 years after it began.

Single Xingenesian demanded this revision herself when in a letter on the DuMore publishing company lidered 1 April, 19740 she asked them to publish a misostanty on women artists. "So often the women is an ort object, neety and resustantly she is able to speak or show their world up. I, for once, would like to have the proofolling to compare myself not just to my make, but also to my female collesques." The same year that Xingemoin demanded this Lynda Benglis published an advertisement in Artiforum for her upcoming exhibition at Paula Cooper Goldeny, New York.

This is the most famous advertisement in Antionen's history, we see a maked, oiled, sun-gloss-wearing Songlis holiding a large latex dilido between her drights. This image was revolutionary for many reasons, but for many it was her fiscial expression that caused the most upman deficer, tips-pieted, self-confident and clearly enjoying the movemen. sums this up in a New York Times article of 2005; "The sense of empowerment, excitantent, aggressiveness and forthrightness so often misundentered to be the province of men. This more than any object, persits or otherwise, is what Lynda Benglis waved at the art works."

To interruptive the history of women and their representation is a langifulg process, and Schor has selected the best decade for such a study. It is a decade rich in feminist political, and "activitis" art, some quite obviously no, such as Lestile Labouits and Susanne Lesty's in Mourning-and in Repril 1977. Reformed on the casps of Los Angeles City Hall, it consisted of 10 women performers, nine all, in black and one clad in scarles, representing the test Los Angeles women who had been raped and murdered by the "Hilbride Sesangler". Each performer spoke as the crowd, describing a different form of violence against women using real numerical statistics. The performance was widelig covered by the media and served to highlight the sensationalist astitude taken by the media and society towards not just this senial killer, but to violence against waster in general, This work precedes the 1978 work by Alexis Human, Disloque with a Repic Based on her octual experience, being accessed late at night by a men with a knile in the street. Human is self-coined radical ferninist ones photography and text in this sequential series. Her self-coined radical ferninist ones photography and text in this sequential series. I blomoso I think IS look ofter myself disnits — Byel The mate aggressor, the villain, becomes the protector, but Human very closely and defeating stores her own abilities: "IS look ofter myself thereis". Human creates the manuality through text, suther than the image, allowing her audience to formulate the visuals and by doing so placing themselves in the situation. The namptive lands lessiff to this method, as it is a real event and one which tuppers more often than it should. Lacry and Labouitz publicly staged a performance whereas Hunter created a more personal, piece, but both are social-political critiques dealing with the problem of violance against women.

The exhibition includes artists whose work is more soletie, through not exently political or dealing with a real issue or experience (as with Labraulta and Lety and Hussen's), still ortiques and makes visible the notogying and storscoppes existent during the period. The work of Portuguese artist Helena Almeids has been described as "Beingl neither loody art, nor performance, painting, drawing or photography; that is to say, her work was afferred as a negation of all the different artistic disciplines." By negating these disciplines though, Molins argues that Almeida frees them from their limits and enables from to have an added dimension. With Estudo pore dob espagos (1977), Alimeida's hunds are pictured draped lightly through less goes and then fencing it is unclear as to whether she is captured, looking out or looking.

in on her captives. The work is a subtle critique of the time when women were simultaneously included and excluded in the art establishment. This is representative of a wider critique that runs through the work of many of the articls in dris exhibition that which Schor defines as the change between the representation of the female body from object to subject. The female body is no longer a maked, senselland object, or depicted by the make it has quite tangently shifted from being passive to an active subject.

The work of Cindy Sherman, Penny Singer and Brigit Jürgemeen makes an active, exaright rejection of traditional female somotypes and portrayals. Jürgemeen, Fathously, in Mauyliquen-Elichenschürer Ohioseuken' Klichen Aposol I 1975 weers a kitchen stove around her neck. Diesond as a housinelle, the stove covers her bedy, signifying her purpose as functional object. The sven door in open, a losel of breed poking out it is both a phallic allusion and one referencing the birth of a child. Slinger's Wedding Invitation — 2 (Are is Just a Piece of Coke) (1973), is deft in its portrayal of herself as a wedding cake. Seated with legs akimbo, wearing a constructed traditional tiered wedding cake, with an open smile on her face and wearing a white wedding well, the image is humorous but wickedly clever in its deconstruction of what the traditional wedding signified(s). The cake is sliced open to reveal her vagina, which has a small white flower on it: Slinger is adeptly and openly critiquing the expectation that a woman would remain a virgin until her wedding day, a day in which she would be "deflowered". Jürgenssen and Slinger use their bodies in these staged photographs to point out the one-dimensional roles traditionally assigned to women: to produce babies and be a housewife.

More specific to the body, the female face became a natural site of contention and discourse: Francesca Woodman's Foce, Providence, Rhode Island, 1975-1976, Jürgenssen's Ohne Titel (1979), and Lynn Hershman Leeson's Roberta Construction Chart *1 (1975), an image of Hershman Leeson's alter-ego Roberta Breitmore, all being key examples. Roberta Breitmore was a four-year performance project begun in 1974, with Roberta existing as a fictional person in real time in her own living quarters, which culminated in an exorcism of Roberta in 1978 ther death). The documentation of her existence is to be found in works such as this "construction chart", where Hershman Leeson documents the literal construction of Roberta's face through the application of make-up, Hershman Leeson is quite vividly articulating the idea that women, through the systematic daily routine of applying make-up, are constructing their own "alter-ego". Jürgenssen does the same with Ohne Tan, a self-portrait with an eerie hand-made skeleton mask placed just inches from her face, masking all save for a glimpse of her eye and cheekbone.

Ewa Partum took this one step further with Change (1974), an investigation into the complicated relationship between women and the process of ageing. Performed in Galeria Adres, Poland, Partum had half of her face painted with heavy make-up to make her appear aged. She then sat for a portrait, the pose and facial expression mimicking Leonardo da Vinci's portrait of one of the world's most famous visages: the Mona Lisa Partum, Hershmann Leeson, and Jürgenssen are each questioning what constitutes female "beauty": is it what is underneath, the skeletal mask signifying the interior? Are women only beautiful with a mask of make-up? How do we live up to societal standards of beauty when we age? Is the female body the site of identity? These questions are further complicated by the reception of female artists in the 1970s by other female artists: Schor gives the example of Jürgenssen being reproached by feminist artists for wearing make-up and dressing fashionably, a critique that Hannah Wilke famously responded to with Moxism and Art. Bewore of Fascist Feminism (1977). The social conventions of what constitutes beauty and how "beauty" is represented is still being questioned, critiqued and analysed - more openly, yes, but nonetheless still in question. Joan Riviere, in her essay of 1929 Warmanliness as a Masquerade, published in the International Journal of Psychopnalysis, says: "Womanliness L... could be worn as a mask [...] The reader may ask where I draw the line between genuine womanliness and the masquerade. My suggestion is L.I that there is no such difference; whether radical or superficial, they are the same thing."

The feminist movement of the 1970s, the feminist avant-garde, is becoming more and more widely researched, collected and identified. Things have changed significantly since the 1970s, and Schor says she sees a level of self-confidence in young female artists that wouldn't have been possible without the movement's revolution, lasting impact and legacy. Yet there is still much historical revision and research to be done to firmly entrench the feminist avant-garde movement in art history. To end with a quote from Molina, as begun: "Careful! — the artist seems to say — history is out there, in ancient tomes buried under the weight of history; in my studio the woman is no longer the equidistant point between the obscene and the beautiful."
